BRYAN, TEXAS, JULY 7, 1910.

The farmers, farmers' wives, farmers' sons and farmers' daughters, of Brazos county, may get busy preparing their exhibits, for the Commercial Club will see to it that the premium list is long, large and very attractive. Last year's exposition was an eye-opener but it wasn't a patching to what will be shown this year. There will be a preliminary exhibit at the Farmers' Congress but the main show will be later.

The moral sense of the entire world is aroused to action in efforts to prohibit moving picture shows of the Reno prize-fight. Then how are the fellows who paid $50,000 for the picture rights going to get their money back? Is morality going to put them in a hole?

Chicago University, founded and maintained with Standard Oil Money, is dissatisfied with the Christianity of the Bible and will endeavor to give the world a "new Christianity," which is to be "scientific, ethical, practical and altruistic." John D. and his school don't like to the only original and genuine brand of Christianity because the methods of Standard Oil cannot be reconciled with the teaching of Jesus.

If there is not a large delegation from Southwest Texas at the Farmers' Congress it will not be the fault of the Beaumont Enterprise, for that paper calls attention to it almost every day. The latest paragraph is: "Three days of discussion at the Farmers' congress at College Station should be of untold advantage to those who have the opportunity to hear the discussion, and everyone should take the opportunity if possible."

Governor Dickerson says the prize fight gave morality in Nevada a big boost. If he had studied a year he couldn't have thought of a better way of expressing the degraded condition of morals in Nevada. God help the state with such a governor and God have mercy on the governor of such a state.

Why not have the agricultural exposition at Dellwood Park? The pavilion could be built and temporarily fitted up for the purpose in ample time. It would be so much pleasanter than the Union warehouse.

The only fowl thing about the agricultural exposition will be the large and complete poultry department, which will contain only the reddest-blooded aristocrats of the choicest breeds.

CEDAR CREEK BARBECUE.

The candidates today looked like the poem said King David looked he had fled from far Jerusalem, his "limbs were weary." Two days of succession of barbecuing, hand shaking and speech making is just a little bit wearing and the boys feel the effects of it. The work of the campaign is not only wearing, but it is also a little acrimonious and that is somewhat trying on the nerves. In the speeches of some of the candidates, the Eagle learns there is quite a bit of crimination and recrimination, and while this is highly amusing and entertaining to the spectators, to the parties at interest it is anything but a joke.

Some of the speakers (not candidates) representing certain of the candidates for governor, grew quite personal in their remarks and some rather vile epithets were applied. There was no breach of the peace, however, and it all ended up pleasantly.

A good dinner was served, which with the fine crops lining the road from Bryan to Cedar creek, made everybody in a good humor and the day was a most pleasant one for all.

FOR SALE.

Will sell for cash the J. E. Player general stock of merchandise at Milligan, valued at about $2,200. Will also sell brick store house in which same is situated. Will also sell gun plant in the town of Milligan, being the only one at that place. Also have farm consisting of 307 acres of land, for sale, near the town of Milligan, also some vacant lots in the town of Milligan. Apply to V. B. Hudson, attorney for Mrs. J. E. Player, postoffice Address, Bryan, Texas. 189w3

HURRAH

FOR THE FOURTH

If you are going to have a picnic or party, make the day a success by serving our delicious ice cream. There is nothing in the world better than what we offer.

Holmes Bros.

Many who call themselves by other party names are at heart Socialists. He defined Socialism as Republicanism gone to seed.

In a moral vein, the senator discussed the education of children, dwelling on the importance of inculcating correct principles instead of teaching them to estimate the value of a man by the amount of money he possesses.

Reverting to the subject of platforms, Senator Bailey described in detail the method of selecting delegates to the conventions of various grades and appointment of the platform committee and sub-committee, the work of drafting the platform, being entrusted entirely to the latter. The weather is always hot and the sub-committee tired—or worse. It was remarkable that the convention that made the platform was never held in a dry town. The fact that delegates to a convention take no oath while senators do was stressed. "None of you," the senator declared, "voted for the delegates to the national convention; all of you voted for me—or ought to have done so." Repudiation of the platform, he alleged, "is not party anarchy but party salvation."

The platform ought not to demand specific legislation but should be simply a statement of general principles. The test of party fealty is not fidelity to the platform pledges but voting the ticket. This, the senator asserted, he had always done, though sometimes he had to hold his nose.

The enormous expenditures of candidates in the preprimary campaign was discussed and the senator said if he were a member of the legislature he would introduce a bill limiting the campaign expenses of a candidate to half the first year's salary. "When I run for the senate again I will have opposition but no opponent." This sentence was the beginning of a sarcastic but good humored portrayal of the "small politician." Congressmen, he said, are not rascals but fools and cowards. The people do not elect dishonest men. There is no need to fear scoundrels. It is the demagogue whom you are to look out for—the man who spends so much time in his efforts to get and keep office that he has no time left for service of the people. Here the senator drew a graphic picture of Washington's social life and described how weak men fell victims to the blandishments of agents of the special interests. As for himself, he asserted that he did not go to social functions but put in his time working for his constituents, alleging that he worked harder than any other man at the national capitol. "When you come to elect a senator, search the record, see who has been always at his post of duty and who does not make mistakes."

The last statement was qualified by adding that while no man was absolutely perfect the people should choose the one who errs the least. By way of illustration he alleged that Jesus Christ was the only perfect character, and He had been crucified between two thieves. If he came back to earth and offended evil doers by His perfect life they would no doubt crucify Him again. The senator then mentioned the fiery ordeal through which he had passed two years ago, intimating, though not asserting, that he was persecuted for righteousness' sake.

The most interesting part of the speech was a brief reference to the state campaign. "I am not in a fighting mood—not till after the primaries," he said. "I will vote my preference, but they can't pull me into the campaign. I want the primary settled without reference to me. I am no boss and have no desire to be one. I am going to vote for Judge Poindexter—he voted for me. When I get afraid to vote for whom I please you may take back my office."

There was nothing new in the reason the senator gave for voting for a tariff on hides unless the duty was taken off boots and shoes. At the conclusion of his remarks on this subject he again called for an expression of approval or disapproval by a show of hands. All who voted, including most of the audience, manifested their approval.

The doctors wanted a department of public health but he was opposed to taking away from the states the power to regulate their own sanitary affairs, because it was an infringement of state rights. This demand originated with the centralizationists who wanted to concentrate all the taxing power in the national government so that opportunities for graft would be greater. The evils of graft were illustrated by showing how the protective tariff enabled American manufacturers to sell goods cheaper in foreign markets than at home. For every dollar that went into the treasury from import duties, seven dollars went into the pockets of the manufacturers. There are ten times as much of manufactured commodities consumed in this country as are exported.

In conclusion, Senator Bailey assured his auditors that he came to talk with them solely because he wished to show his respect and gratitude to them for their favors to him. He had no higher ambition than to be able to lay his hand on his heart and say he had done his duty.

Senator Bailey's speech occupied a little more than two hours, but he held the attention of the large audience to the last word. It was evidently a Bailey crowd. The speech was often punctuated with ejaculations of approval and sometimes the senator digressed to exchange interlocutory remarks with some whose admiration, bubbled over. These incidents served to enliven the discussion, and usually took a humorous turn.

Among the distinguished gentlemen present, not otherwise mentioned, were Congressman Rufus Hardy and former Congressman Scott Field, but neither of them appeared on the platform.

The Eagle representative takes pleasure in acknowledging his appreciation of many courtesies by the management of the festivities, and by citizens of Calvert. Especially does he cherish in grateful remembrance the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. John Garrett, who entertained him with true Southern hospitality in their elegant home. Their beneficence is the more highly appreciated because the hotels were overcrowded and late arrivals could not secure beds, or even cots, for love or money. Most of the Bryan contingent spent the night till train time in the street.
